Before federation servers can be grouped as a farm, they must first be clustered so that requests that arrive at a single fully qualified domain name (FQDN) are routed to the various federation servers in the server farm. You can create the server cluster by deploying Network Load Balancing (NLB) inside the corporate network. This guide assumes that NLB has been configured appropriately to cluster each of the federation servers in the farm.

Does the solution meet the goal?

A. Yes

B. No

Answer: B

Explanation:

Anyone using TLS must be mindful of how certificates are validated. The first thing an attacker is likely to try against any TLS implementation is to conduct a man-in-the-middle attack that presents self-signed or otherwise forged certificates to TLS clients (and servers, if client certificates are in use). To its credit, Microsoft's implementation of TDS is safe in the sense that it enables certificate validation by default, which prevents this attack.

From Scenario: Common security issues such as SQL injection and XSS must be prevented.

Database-related security issues must not result in customers' data being exposed.

Note:

TDS depends on Transport Layer Security (TLS)/Secure Socket Layer (SSL) for network channel encryption.

The Tabular Data Stream (TDS) Protocol is an application-level protocol used for the transfer of requests and responses between clients and database server systems. In such systems, the client will typically establish a long-lived connection with the server. Once the connection is established using a transport-level protocol, TDS messages are used to communicate between the client and the server. A database server can also act as the client if needed, in which case a separate TDS connection has to be established.
